

front

A large grid of black and white squares, likely a binary matrix or a specific type of code representation. The pattern is highly symmetric and follows a clear rule: a square is black if its row index plus its column index is even, and white if it is odd. This results in a checkerboard-like pattern where every second row and every second column is inverted relative to the one before it.